Hallie Winter, Curator at the Osage Nation Museum said, “The Osage Nation Museum has been serving the Osage people for 77 years. We are excited to bring pieces from our collection directly to our community during Native American Heritage month. Our hope is that individuals that may not have had a chance to visit our location are able to experience a part of the Osage Nation Museum in a new and exciting way. We are happy to celebrate and promote our Osage art, culture and history. Our hope is that people will become stimulated by what they experience in the Mobile Museum and will make a return trip to our location on the Osage Nation’s campus.”

About the Osage Nation Museum

In 1934, Osage Tribal Councilman and writer John Joseph Mathews became interested in the conservation of Osage culture through President Franklin Roosevelt’s Works Progress Administration (WPA) program. At the time of its opening in 1938, it was the only museum in the world owned by an American Indian tribe, and it is known as the “oldest tribally-owned museum in the United States”. Throughout the last 77 years the museum has served as a place to remember who we once were and to celebrate who we are today. The Osage Tribe of Indians of Oklahoma became the Osage Nation after reorganization of our government through a new constitution which was signed on May 6, 2006. Following this reorganization, the Osage Tribal Museum, Library and Archives became the Osage Nation Museum (ONM). The ONM remains true to our commitment of celebrating what it means to be Osage through continuous exhibition and educational programming.
